Das Wetter

Watching Das Wetter with Claudia Kleinert always reminds me of work. Maybe not really work work, but getting paid to do something on a friday afternoon after an outdoor Surinaamse Broodjes lunch at Dennis Frietpaleis with a cold can of Coke delivered to my desk searching for appropriate content. This kind of content. First rule of professional blogging is to plan for the long term. So, while there are quite some hits for it on the youtube, don't cherry pick and blow them all on a single post (unless the post is pure genius). Since we were planning a weekly post with damn fine women telling us something about the weather while mentioning what the real weather for the coming weekend would probably be, I didn't want to run out of them very soon, and to prevent jumping the shark at some point the quality of the posts should increase over time. Sad of course I kinda jumped the shark myself and never made it to the one I saved for the finale. And only Claudia Kleinert can increase the quality of Claudia Kleinert I noticed today.

The real thing on a Sony Bravia looks even better. The above picture is taken with a Sony−Ericsson P800 of the screen of the Bravia on DVB−T in the stopped TV mode that's presumably made for this kind of use (a full length Harrison Ford movie running next to it while I construct this post), and then I gimped a bit with the colors to try to get the sweater as hot pink as on TV, but that's not completely achieved and her hair got a bit pinkish in the process. But I'm sure the weather will be fine this long weekend.
